recent survey of event planners indicate that the number of organizational holiday parties is up substantially from the last few years. Hopefully this is another indicator that the economy is on the rise. Irrespective of the larger economic implications, the company holiday party can either be an enjoyable career booster or destructive career bomb. Here are some tips to help you make the most of this rare opportunity and avoid the most common holiday party disasters.

Paths Forward

- DO Go. One of the biggest mistakes you can make is to not attend. Your employer has invested time, energy and money so the least you can do is attend and say thank you. A little courtesy goes a long way. The holiday party is an excellent way to expand your network and increase your visibility.

- DON'T Overindulge. Meeting planners report that more than 80% of companies serve alcoholic beverages. If you typically use alcohol it's totally appropriate to enjoy a drink or two but over-imbibing can make you the subject of gossip, the target of ridicule or even get you disciplined or fired. Holiday party missteps can frequently be traced back to misuse of alcohol.

- DO Arrive On Time or Early. The least stressful time to make your presence known to senior staff is before the festivities get into full swing. These are the folks who make decisions about raises and promotions and this is an appropriate and relaxed opportunity to help them learn your name. Be prepared to introduce yourself and your date, offer appreciation for the event and a few pleasantries. Then move on; don't try to monopolize their time.

- DON'T Flirt. Never troll for affection at a company event. Never. It will erode your reputation, it will damage your work relationships and will hurt your career. If you need two words to cool your jets, consider the phrase sexual harassment.

- DO Realize This Is a Business Event. It may be called a holiday party but it is not a party party; it is a business event albeit in an enjoyable venue and relaxed mood. It is not opening night of the opera season nor is it a Jimmy Buffet concert. Ask around for what is traditionally considered appropriate attire. The sexy Santa Baby outfit or kooky reindeer sweater with the blinking nose will get you remembered but probably not in a good way.

- DO Meet New People but DON'T Talk Business. This is a great opportunity to grow your network by meeting folks you don't normally work with and who might help you make connections in the future. But other than "So what do you do?" keep work talk to a minimum. This applies to your current work friends and colleagues too. Finding out about people's lives and interests outside of work will help you strengthen those relationships.

- DON'T Avoid Other Parties. That is - holiday parties given by other companies. If your spouse or a friend needs an escort to their holiday party do not be shy about going. They can be even better networking opportunities because you know fewer people to start with. Just remember my suggestions because your behavior will also reflect on your date.

- DO Consider the Newsletter. Be aware if pictures are being taken. Except for professional dancers hardly anybody looks cool while dancing and nobody looks cool munching a chicken wing. That flick of you with a silly face, juggling your spouse's purse and 2 cocktail glasses or an innocent sideways glance that looks suspiciously inappropriate will live a long life after the company newsletter hits the web. Prepare for a calm and collected pose if necessary and express your unwillingness to have pictures of you published anywhere without your permission.

- DON'T Call In Sick The Next Day. No one will believe you!

LifeMap is about helping you make the most productive use of all career development opportunities. Happy New Year!
